It was two o'clock in the afternoon of April 27 when Commodore Dewey, with his little squadron of warships, put out from Mirs Bay on his errand of destruction. He had taken on his flagship General Aguinaldo, leader of the last insurrection against the power of Spain in her island colony, who had been spending his few months of exile in Hong-Kong, and who now dreamed of the liberation of his people from more than three centuries of thralldom, with the aid of the great Eepublic of the West. Three days the ships sailed over the blue depths of the China Sea in the serenest season of the year, measuring the pace by the easy speed of the supply transports. A constant drill was kept up on board and every vessel was put in trim for instant action. On Saturday, April 30, the dim outline of the Luzon coast appeared upon the far horizon to the east, and gradually the verdant cordillera of the island s western elevation became distinctly defined across the placid waters. In the afternoon the Baltimore, the Boston, and the Concord were detached 183 to steam down the coast and look into Subig Bay, twenty miles above the entrance to the Bay of Manila; for, if the Spaniards meant to dispute that entrance with the American squadron, it was at Subig Bay that they would be likely to make their stand, and...
