There is abundant evidence to prove that, in the early ages of Christianity, many ecclesiastical establishments in this country were constructed entirely of wood. Bede relates that, in 627, Edwin the king, on his conversion from paganism, was solemnly baptized and initiated into the mysteries of the Christian religion in a wooden church, on the spot where now stands the cathedral of York. The first church at Lindisfarne, in Holy Island, was constructed in 652, of sawn oak, and thatched. William of Malmsbury mentions a church of wood at Dutlinge, in Somersetshire; and Ingulphus relates, that the abbey of Croyland, with all the extensive outbuildings, was formed of wood and boards, exactly joined and beautifully worked, with the exception of the roof, which was covered with lead. In a charter to Malmsbury abbey, granted by king Edgar, occurs a clause relating to certain reforms necessary to the welfare of the establishment.
